James Cullens, who lives on a ranch on the Blanco, just across the line into New Mexico, about 18 miles northeast of St. Johns was in town Saturday and Sunday purchasing supplies. He reports good success in dry farming on his ranch this year, from 12 acres of yellow flint corn he raised 300 bushels of corn. He also planted squash, pumpkins, beans, turnips, potatoes, etc., and raised good crops of each. This goes to prove that a great deal of dry farming could be done—and with success—in this country. The many broad acres in Apache County are but waiting for the men who have the faith to try.
